

Matheus Serrano

Sustainable Tourism: Educating the Next Generation

Educating the sustainable tourism is about traveling in a way that can protect the environment, respect the local cultures and supports the local tourism is driven by it can affect nature and local communities if not done correctly/responsibly. This is why it is important to teach the next generation on how they can travel responsible. First, we need to teach the youth on how important it is to protect the environment when they travel by avoiding littering, avoid use of plastics, promote recycling in support with businesses who focuses on “Go Green” initiatives. By us thinking about our actions we can help the beautiful places around the world for our future generation sustainable tourism and respecting our local cultures. When going to new places it's important to learn about traditions and cultures from the people that live there. This mutual respect comprehending and ensuring that tourism can also benefit the local community and their way of life. When supporting our local economy can be a key part of a sustainable tourism by eating at local restaurants, shopping at local businesses, staying at local hotels, visiting museums and attractions. By supporting our local businesses, this will help create job opportunities and build loyalty with travelers. We must educate the next generation on how to travel safe and responsible, build a positive community and maintain a clean environment for generations to come.